Right to work ordinance spurs controversy in Sussex County

Oct 31, 2017 SUSSEX COUNTY, Del. - "The right to work is wrong."

An article posted on line by Channel 47 ABC © written by Dani Bozzini talked about an ordinance that would make Sussex County a "Right-to-Work" county. The ordinance was introduced by Councilman Rob Artett, and he quoted in the article:

"Many companies won't even look at a state or a municipality if they're not right to work automatically. So, to me if we can add new options and explore new avenues that this county has never done before, that's important," explains Councilman Rob Arlett, who introduced the ordinance.

The article further stated that Local workers, many of whom are union members, say right to work is a right to work for less. "The protection of women and minorities in the workplace and equal pay have all come from the unions they haven't come from management," said Bette McGrath talking against RTW. She continues, "The right to unionize is a human rights issue."

The article concluded by stating that Councilman Arlett hopes to have a vote by the end of this year. The date of that public hearing has not been made.
